REDISTRICTING PROCESS

Phoenix residents are encouraged to get involved in establishing new City Council districts as the city begins its effort to redraw lines to reflect the 2010 Census results. The city's population has grown during the last 10 years and based on the new census data, the council districts will grow from 165,000 to approximately 180,000 residents.

A series of public meetings has been scheduled throughout the city to educate the community about the process, gather input to identify communities of interest, and receive feedback regarding changes to the boundaries. The kickoff to the series of meetings will be a technical workshop to provide an overview of the 2010 Census data and how it applies to the redistricting process, and to explain how the new online mapping tool works. The meetings are expected to last one hour and will include a formal presentation followed by a question-and-answer session.
